One way to drive the message home on men’s health issues for Movember is to decorate your courtesy bus.

Head of urology Glen Wood said it was important to speak about prostate cancer, which has become one of the busiest areas of urology at the hospital.

“In its early stages, prostate cancer is usually an asymptomatic disease. The patient can have no symptoms whatsoever,” Dr Wood said.

“We now recommend men from the age of 50 have a PSA test every two years, and men over the age of 40 who have a positive family history for young-age prostate cancer have testing every two years.

Men are very good at shelving their problems and getting on with life but if they’re concerned about prostate cancer, we have the resources to investigate them and to manage their disease.”

Greenslopes Private Hospital has one of Queensland’s largest private urology units.
